

Today's News - November 22, 2002

'Tis the season for urban waterfronts: Two docks in Amsterdam take on new life as a suburban-style housing project, pick up an award for urban design, and get star billing at an exhibition at Harvard Design School. – WTC plans in progress are "almost too fantastic to be described" (we'll get to see them in December). – Montreal's planned $3 billion waterfront development welcomes public input. – Penn's Landing in Philadelphia may get an ersatz London Eye. – An international competition to overhaul pockets of shoddy buildings in the UK. – Xanadu or an urban village for New Jersey's Meadowlands. – Template design for hospitals. – New hospitality in Kabul, and theme park suites elsewhere. – Retail goes green in Montreal. – A Stalin-era architect watches his buildings decay. – In tough times, good news for architecture students in Canberra. – Troubled times for government projects in the UK. – Chicago Athenaeum's American Architecture Awards...and more.

Editor's note: We've received a notice from The Architects' Journal (UK) that it is going to become a "paid-for website (for most information)" beginning on Monday...we'll see what remains free access...sad news indeed.
